

Presents Workshop on

Team Building and Leading Teams

A team is a small number of people with complementary skills who are committed to a common purpose, set of performance goals, and approach for which they hold themselves mutually accountable.

Context

The whole is always greater than the sum of its parts. Great leaders intuitively understand and operate from this paradigm. The new science of building great things tells us how should we communicate, inspire and relate things to engage the people and help them explore for higher growth, improving productivity and innovation. Researchers at leading academics like Harvard Business School have significantly deciphered the methodology behind the building and leading great things. This workshop will help us understand and implement the science of creating, sustaining and leveraging great things for continued superior organization performance.

Objectives

- Outstanding performance leading to business results
- Ready to accept any change
- Innovation and implementation
- Superior decision making due to collective thinking
- Leadership beyond management
- Commitment towards Common Purpose

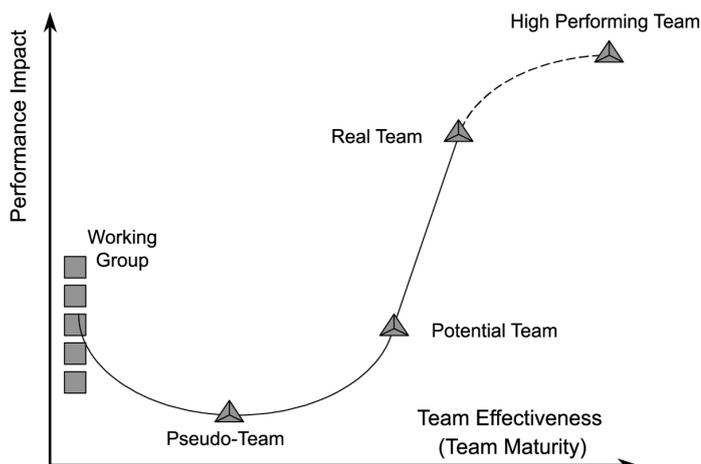

Teams outperform individuals, especially when performance requires multiple skills, and experiences. Team is always a result of pursuing a 'performance challenge' rather than a group of individuals trying to become a team.

Target Group

Managers in all Levels
